

I actually live in Georgia and Texas. I travel many, many times, back and forth each year. In addition my husband's job will offer occasional travel. We have benefited tremendously from XM's broadcasting of traffic and weather. Sometimes the two are related, you do understand that don't you? It is especially important in the South during the often trubulent Spring. Finding a local station on AM/FM radio is often difficult and you may miss the reports you need while scanning for a channel. We have just returned from his attending a professional conference in New Orleans and we followed that with visits with family in Houston and Fort Worth. We listened to the traffic reports upon entering the cities, as well as driving to a concert at Texas Stadium. Also, I have found it difficult to even find a station in some rural areas. I urge you to leave this issue alone and would hope satellite radio can even expand to include more televison networks such as ABC,CBS and NBC.
